

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force its stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

What we don't need are partisan documentaries that have the potential to sabotage the democratic process. The bigger companies get, the more difficult the oversight process becomes.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. More voices are better than fewer. Sinclair is showing why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
